Recent Experiments Prove That Graham Bread Is Not Best.

Conclusion Reached by Series of Comparative Digestion Trials-Well Bolted Flour Food Said to Be the non condition.

Another tradition long prevalent throughout the world and fostered by physicians for a century past has been upset. The United States department of agriculture has been conducting experiments which prove that the gluten and other nutrients in graham bread are less completely digested than the same nutrients in white bread, the bran and other wheat offals in the graham flour lessening its digestibility. This conclusion has been reached from a series of comparative digestion trials covering a period of six years. A number of men in sound health were workingmen, others were students, men of both sedentary and active habits being included in the trials.

A teamster, a college athlete, a naturally lazy fellow, and both corpulent and lean men were subjects of experiment. In one set of tests the men were fed for several days upon graham bread and milk. Then white bread was substituted for the graham, and the same number of days the rations consisted of white bread and milk. All of the food consumed was weighed and samples were analyzed, as were all of the waste products from the body. The graham and the white flours were milled from the same lot of wheat. The conclusion reached is briefly stated as fol-"According to the chemical analysis of graham, entire wheat and standard patent flours milled from the same lot of hard Scotch Fife wheat, the graham flour contained the highest and the patent the lowest percentage of total protein (glutinous matter).

"But, according to the results of digestion experiments with these flours, the proportion of digestible or available protein and available energy in the patent flour were larger than in either the entire wheat or the graham flour. The lower digestibility of the protein in the graham flours is due to the fact that in both of these a considerable portion of the protein is contained in the coarser particles (bran), and so resists the action of the digestive juices and escapes digestion. Thus, while there actually may be more protein in a given amount of graham or entire wheat flour than in the same weight of patent flour from the same wheat, the body obtains less of the protein and energy from the coarse flour than it does from the fine, because, although the including of the bran and germ increases the percentage of protein, it decreases the digestibility."

Those who really enjoy graham bread and find that it agrees with them should continue its use. The beneficial results arise not from increased nutrients secured from the food, but from the mechanical action of the food.

Bullet-Proof Wnistcont Made for President Roosevelt-Inventor Says

Casimer Zeglen, a Polish resident of South Bend, Ind., has invented a bulletproof cloth from which a waistcoat has been made for President Roosevelt.

The waistcoat is of pure white silk, is pliable, and weighs less than half a pound to the square foot. It is half an inch in thickness, and is worn next the body. The durability of the new invention is unquestioned, as it has been thoroughly tested, members of the police department having failed to puncture it with 44-caliber leaden bullets.

"The secret of the cloth lies in the closeness of the weaving," said Zegien 'Two weeks before President McKinley was killed I offered a waistcoat to him but Secretary Cortelyou stated that the matter could not be considered until the following month."

Superstitious Gamblers at Monte Car lo Pile Money Around Number Thirteen and It Comes Three Times.

A striking example of the supersti tion of gamblers in regard to luck occurred at what is known as the "Suicides' table" at the casino at Monte Carlo recently.

A fly alighted on No. 13 after the players had been suffering from a persistent run of bad luck. In a moment the middle dozen was liberally backed. Then an elderly gambler piled napoleons around 13, the less confident staking their money on transversals. Then the marble spun. The croupler announced that the winning number was 13. Furthermore, 13 came three times in succession, and the fly cost the casino £5,000.
